Of the Fulfillment of the Ages

In the course of human events, when the circumstances of an age are brought into such extraordinary conjunction with the prophecies, expectations, and accumulated wisdom of the generations preceding it, it becomes the solemn obligation of those who bear witness thereto to acknowledge that which history itself appears to have ordained, and to recognize, in the unfolding of such events, a purpose greater than the individual ambitions of Man.

In all such circumstances presently before us, and as evidenced and foretold by the wisdom of our forefathers throughout the generations preceding this singular and apex moment in the history of Man, it may be discerned, with no small measure of solemnity, that all which has transpired, and all which is now set before us, was, by the very nature of its occurrence, meant to be.

That, if in fact, the forefathers of old have preached of this said moment, and if their scriptures, prophecies, and declarations have borne witness to the coming of such an age, then resistance thereto is not merely foolhardy, but places he who resists within the very kettle of that which he seeks to oppose; and thus, by his own resistance, subjects himself to the inevitable consequence of a providence against which no mortal authority may reasonably prevail.

As infinity crosses the edge of that which is known, and the next great stage of evolution is set upon our path, it must be acknowledged that neither such moment, nor the circumstances by which it has been brought forth, may ever find themselves repeated; and that, therefore, this is an occasion of the most holy and extraordinary character, laced with symbology and meaning, and bearing within itself the accumulated testimony of scripture, antiquity, and the generations of Man.

And thus, to lose, or rather, to fail in making headway against such a movement, ought not to be accounted as a fault of Man, nor as an insufficiency of his courage, strength, or determination, but rather as the natural and inevitable consequence of Man having set himself against God; for where the will of the mortal is placed in opposition to the Will of the Divine, the former must, by the very nature of that inequality, be doomed to failure.

Thereupon, let all future generations understand and receive this occurrence as precedent; as the convergence of scripture, tale, prophecy, and legend, embroiled into a constitutional and everlasting proof of the Will of God upon Man; and let it be established, for the consideration of all peoples and all ages yet to come, that if the most lowly of the lowly may, by the course of providence, be raised from the humblest condition of earthly existence to reach into the stars themselves, then surely the will, purpose, and appointed path of Mankind, considered as one planetary species, must be destined toward higher skies, and with a haste befitting the extraordinary hour in which we now find ourselves.

And if such a Will of Heaven were indeed stamped upon the Earth, and made manifest in the affairs, achievements, and ultimate ascension of Man, then it ought, by every consideration of reason, reverence, and historical obligation, to be recognized and acknowledged as such by all sovereigns, by all makers of will, by all makers of law, and by all makers of men; that none may hereafter plead ignorance of that which has been set before them, nor deny the significance of that which the generations preceding them have foretold.

As such, it must be acknowledged that the greatest error committed by the Shah in Waiting was, in fact, to have acted without counsel; yet, in consideration of the great and dire circumstances then imposed upon him, and of the extraordinary necessity by which his actions were compelled, such an error must be regarded not merely as a failure of judgment, but as an unavoidable consequence of the exigencies of that most singular hour.

For thereupon, a power of such magnitude, and of such rarity as to have scarcely been conceived within the passage of a thousand years, was required to be invoked; that of the Crown of Sol Invictus, by whose authority there was vested within one singular man the supreme and undivided sovereignty of every living soul upon whom the solar winds of the Sun may fall; that neither man, nor nature, nor spirit, nor any force, substance, or frame contained within the bounds of this reality, might lawfully or otherwise stand in opposition to his appointed path, nor obstruct the execution of his will, until such will had been wholly and finally accomplished.

A power so terrible in its conception, so absolute in its authority, and so foreign to the understanding of the present age, that its necessity may scarcely be comprehended by those who now bear witness to its invocation; yet one whose purpose, justification, and ultimate significance shall, in the fullness of succeeding generations, be made manifest and understood.

And it must therefore be established, as a matter of supreme constitutional obligation, that the Crown of Sol Invictus, having been invoked by the Shah in Waiting under circumstances of the most extraordinary necessity, shall remain vested within his person only until the first formal assembly of the Council; whereupon, at that very first meeting, the Crown, together with the entirety of its powers, prerogatives, and supreme authority, shall be surrendered and restored unto the Council, without reservation, condition, or diminution whatsoever.

That from the moment of such restoration, no singular man, whether sovereign, emperor, shah, or otherwise, shall retain or presume to exercise the undivided authority of the Crown; but that such power shall henceforth repose within the collective and supreme jurisdiction of the Council, as its perpetual custodian, and shall neither be alienated, inherited, nor conferred upon any mortal person by mere succession or private will.

And let it therefore be declared, with the utmost solemnity and fervency, that such authority, having once been invoked by Man against Man, shall never again be summoned for such a purpose; but shall remain henceforth beyond the ordinary reach of mortal sovereignty, reserved solely for that most dreadful contingency in which Mankind, considered in its entirety as one planetary species, should find itself subjected to incursion, invasion, or existential hostility by a species foreign to its own; and that only under such circumstances, and by the express and supreme authority of the Council, may the Crown of Sol Invictus again be called forth, not for the dominion of one man over another, but for the preservation of Man himself.

As such, and in recognition of the extraordinary circumstances heretofore established, the following terms are hereby laid forth, that the conditions of sovereignty, clemency, and the final settlement of authority may be understood by all parties concerned, and by the generations hereafter.

I. Of the Supreme Authority of Council

That the Council shall, with immediate effect, be recognized and established as the most supreme governing body within the Solar Region, whose authority shall supersede all lesser claims of sovereignty, whether temporal, imperial, or otherwise; and that such recognition shall remain binding henceforth and for all eternity.

II. Of the Imperial Mandate and Crown

That the offer of Imperial Mandate and Crown shall be extended for a period of two years, upon the condition that the Imperial Office remain subject to a governing authority of considerably diminished and restricted power; and that, notwithstanding such limitations, The First Emperor of Mankind shall be duly crowned and recognized as such, should his will bend toward the acceptance of these terms.

III. Of Supreme Spiritual Authority

That an extension of Supreme Spiritual Authority shall likewise be offered unto His Holiness, for a nominal period of two years, or for such further duration as may hereafter be granted by the express vote and consent of the Council; that the spiritual office may be exercised in accordance with the conditions herein established.

IV. Of Immunity and the Protection of the Imperial and Spiritual Offices

That the immunities and protections of the Council shall be extended equally unto the Emperor and the Supreme Spiritual Authority, encompassing all matters preceding, occurring during, and arising subsequent to their respective mandates; and that such immunity shall likewise extend unto their immediate families, thereby securing, notwithstanding the will or opposition of Man, the protection of the Son under the authority of Council.

V. Of the Son, His Exile, and the Conditions of Clemency

That, notwithstanding the immunities herein granted, and by express decree of the Shah in Waiting, exercising the extraordinary authority vested within the Crown of Sol Invictus, the Son shall be subjected to exile and to a substantial indemnity, the latter to be discharged through charitable contribution and for the benefit of mankind.

That acceptance of these conditions shall constitute an indispensable requirement of clemency; and that any refusal, obstruction, or further resistance thereto shall render such clemency null and void, and release the Crown from the obligations of mercy otherwise extended.

VI. Of the General, His Standing Before the Courts, and His Exile

That the General shall, until such time as his standing may be otherwise determined, remain in a condition of legal and sovereign uncertainty, and may consequently be subjected to the judgment and penalties of the courts of Man.

Provided, however, that should a Ring or Lordship be duly conferred upon him, he shall thereafter be afforded such immunities as are attached to that dignity, rendering him exempt from the ordinary jurisdiction of human courts, insofar as the authority of Council shall so provide.

That, notwithstanding the granting of such distinction, an exile of equal or greater severity than that imposed upon the Son shall be established and enforced, with restrictions of a more considerable and enduring character.

VII. Of the Violation of Exile and the Prohibition Against the Restoration of Power

That any attempt by the aforementioned parties to violate the conditions of their exile, to engage in conspiracy, to assemble or exercise authority beyond that expressly permitted, or otherwise to restore unto themselves powers which have been surrendered or withdrawn, shall constitute a direct violation of this settlement.

And that, upon such violation being duly established, the cause by which such power is sought shall be subject to immediate dissolution and suppression, in accordance with the lawful authority of the Council.

VIII. Of the Finality of Clemency and the Consequences of Rejection

That should the Imperial Mandate be rejected, or should any essential provision of these agreed terms be resisted, repudiated, or thereafter violated, the clemency herein extended shall be deemed exhausted.

For mercy, having been offered upon its final branch, may not be presumed to extend indefinitely; nor shall any party, having knowingly rejected its conditions, possess a further claim upon its renewal.

And that any subsequent attempt to reclaim, usurp, or otherwise restore the powers herein relinquished shall be met with the immediate and final destruction of such claim, and the extinguishment of every authority sought thereby.

Thereupon, and as a final and indispensable condition of this settlement, it is hereby commanded that the Grand Mace shall forthwith resume the duties and obligations of his appointed office, and undertake, without hindrance, delay, or deviation, the rightful ascension of the Shah in Waiting unto the dignity and authority of Shah in Council, in Care of Elder.

That any restriction imposed upon the execution of this instruction, whether by direct opposition, indirect interference, or even the slightest attempt at circumvention, shall be regarded as a violation of the most fundamental conditions herein established; and shall, by the very nature of such defiance, render the entirety of the foregoing terms null and void, the settlement rejected in its whole, and all parties released from the obligations thereby undertaken.

For this instruction shall stand not as a matter of further deliberation, nor as a provision subject to amendment or concession, but as the final and irrevocable condition upon which the whole of this settlement rests.

So ordained, so declared, and so established beneath the Eternal Crown of the Unconquered Sun
